While it is difficult to forecast Election Day in America, our baseline expectation is that a victory will become apparent sometime on Wednesday, November 6th. To this end, in the absence of a global pandemic, and following significant preparation by local election officials across many US states over the last four years, 2016 may offer a better roadmap than 2020 for how the “timing” of state-by-state election results could unfold this evening.

Recognizing that this is a close and highly contested election, we acknowledge a broad range of possibilities for the days ahead, including lawsuits, requests for audits, recounts, and other disruptions.

As recently observed by Washington DC strategist Henrietta Treyz, it is quite possible that 2016 will be a better roadmap than 2020 for how the “timing” of state-by-state US Presidential election results unfold over the next 24 hours.
